Elon Musk took the stage at the World Wide Developers Conference to talk about Apple's HomePod, Spotify and the future of artificial intelligence at the conference. He also took a jab at the iPhone X that some in the tech industry feel may not be as special as originally thought. "The iPhone X is a middle finger to consumers", said Musk, referring to iPhone X's nearly bezel-

less display. Musk also spoke about possible future uses of the features in the iPhone X. He explains that artificial intelligence means having computers know about what you are doing and react to it. He also goes on to describe how someone can use Apple's ResearchKit app to determine if the person is suffering from depression and even prescribe medication to treat the depression.

"That's something that you just can't find any longer". So there you have it: Apple is playing some sort of mind games with its users, and if that doesn't get us excited, the price tag does. The company's closest rival, Google Home, can be a bit more specific. It can read aloud texts, search the web, get the weather and play music. "At Apple we're always innovating to make a great experience for our customers", he said. "This is where Apple is really good at this - they give people who think they don't know much, something useful to know", he said. He said he has used it for a month and has a few theories for why Apple chose to release its own over-ear headphones. Recommended News
